

THE STORY

Ten years after a contained zombie outbreak, sisters Joni and Samira, along with Ramon, Joni's love interest, head to a secluded country house for what promises to be an unforgettable party. The night's surprise comes when Rusty, a small time drug dealer, arrives with a chained zombie. The guests plan to extract its saliva, a banned drug that delivers euphoric, transcendent highs.

An antidote exists, but users must inject it within hours of the high to avoid turning. Persuaded by Joni, Samira joins in as the group ties up the zombie and begin their trip. Each spirals into personal bliss and spread out across the vast property, leaving Ramon, immune to the drug, to supervise.

But when Betty, the host's cousin, fends off an assault from one of the trippers and accidentally frees the zombie, the night descends into horror.

Joni and Samira return to the house to find their friends fighting for their lives. Several are bitten, accelerating their transformations. In the chaos, half the antidotes are destroyed, leaving too few to save everyone.

Now the friends have to agree on who gets the remaining viable doses. Games of chance, failed democratic processes, betrayal, manipulation and bickering ensues. Eventually the last vestiges of civility crumbles, and the house becomes a slaughterhouse when the zombies break in.

Together with Ramon, Joni and Samira cling to each other, while running out of time. They have to battle zombies, their friends and their failing immune system to get a hold of the last two antidotes.
